Quincy Valley Medical Center officials are telling people to wait and see the surprise they have in store today (Thursday, Jan. 24) at the center's clinic.

The medical center shut down its clinic temporarily at the end of December for renovations, and staff members and volunteers have been working frantically on the project for the last four weeks.

The clinic's doors will open tonight at 6:30 p.m. for an open house with food and drinks. Community members are encouraged to come and take a look at the project and also meet new clinic physician Mary Klinger.

On the specific details of the project, hospital community relations director Dick Burkenpas remained mum.

"We want to keep it a surprise," he said. "We have big things in store for the clinic and this is just the first phase of what we want to accomplish."

Much of the work on the project was done by Burkenpas himself, who worked many long hours over the holiday season to see that the renovations were made on time.

Community members are invited to come and see his handiwork as well as the efforts of other medical center employees and volunteers.
